

Breaking "Small Group Ice"

The first minutes of small-group meetings are vital. Good icebreakers can cut away social barriers and promote open sharing throughout the rest of the meeting.

Rules of thumb...Good Icebreakers:

- Take 10-15 minutes at the beginning of a group discussion.
- Are low-key and non-threatening – never embarrassing!
- Are ones that everyone can answer and get the whole group involved, especially the quiet person who needs encouragement to talk and the experience of hearing his or her own voice in the group.
- Can enrich the discussion by connecting with the topic at hand. For example, before discussing the Bible passage about Jesus quieting the storm on the sea, ask the group to tell about a boating experience they've had.

Some things to remember...

- Since you asked the question and have had time to think about it, it's often good for you to answer first.
- Whoever answers the ice breaker first sets the tone for the group.
- Be sensitive about how much time you take answering the question because others will follow your lead!
- People need to share at a surface level before they can go deeper. As the group grows closer over time, ice breaker questions can grow deeper.
- Give people the freedom to "pass" (i.e. not answer the question).
